Introduction: rationale for 'three faces'

Human capabilities: the capacity to achieve ways of being and doing that we have reason to value

Empowerment: the capacity to reflect, question and challenge the structures of power in our lives

The consequences of choice

The conditions of choice: material and discursive possibilities

Citizenship: the capacity to act with others to claim our rights as citizens and to participate in reformulating existing rights to expand the circle of citizenship and to address excluded forms of injustice

Forms of organization

Repertoires of collective action

The inter-relationship between different forms of agency
